

I think the FCC should continue to regulate broadband service. I use an independent ISP (and have for years) which may come under threat if BellSouth and other regional phone monopolies are allowed to set their own prices (or completely cut off access) for third-party service providers. If I wanted to use the phone company's broadband service, I would have switched to it already. Regulation is supposed to ensure that customers get a fair choice in any given market space, and I don't believe that the large phone companies will continue to allow that in the absence of FCC regulation.